TD and CNF together support over 100 Aboriginal nurses

Since 2009, the TD Aboriginal Nursing Fund has helped over 100 Aboriginal nurses and nursing students in their pursuit of nursing excellence!

These nurses are now prepared to provide much-needed care to Aboriginal communities, many of which face health challenges such as diabetes, infant mortality, tuberculosis, and suicide. Funding for post-secondary education to increase the number of nurses for these vulnerable populations is critical. Thank you, TD, for your vision and leadership in helping support solutions to this urgent need.

The CNF awards program benefits nurses by instilling a sense of pride and encouragement.

Mary Beth Skinner

CNF through its partnerships promotes awareness and support of nursing education and recruitment. This is invaluable, given the current nursing shortage.

Dr. Ruth Martin-Misener

As a graduate of the Dalhousie University Outpost Nursing Program, Ruth Martin-Misener lived and worked for two years in Canada’s North. “This was one of the most satisfying and rewarding experiences of my career,” she says. “The community was beautiful but remote; the only way in and out was by air. Travel time to the nearest hospital was over an hour.” Ruth cared for mothers and babies, helped seniors with chronic conditions, and remembers how satisfying it was to work with community leaders to improve health services and community health.

While she was still in the North, Dalhousie University invited Ruth back as a teacher. “This program was, in effect, Canada’s first Nurse Practitioner (NP) program,” explains Ruth. In 1998, Ruth received the Canadian Nurses Foundation Johnson & Johnson Master’s award. “I still remember how thrilled I was! It was acknowledgment of my potential for future success and helped to support my master’s research work.” Since then, she has been active in developing the NP role and education across the country.

Ruth focuses her research on better access to good primary health care. “It’s my passion. I believe in close teamwork between health care providers, and involving patients and communities in planning and evaluating improvements,” she explains. In addition to teaching in the Master’s and PhD programs, Ruth has 56 journal publications to her credit, and many awards and honours.

Message from the Executive Director

Just as the fall harvest celebrates the bounty of a year of hard work, so too CNF shares and celebrates with all of you the successes and achievements of this year’s award recipients - 64 strong! With your help, these nurses and nursing students are now able to work with patients, families, and communities for stronger and healthier lives. You will see a few of their stories in this edition of our newsletter, and you can find more on our website www.cnf-fiic.ca.

In particular, I would like to thank TD Bank Group - their commitment and generosity has helped over 100 Aboriginal youth and nurses to achieve their educational goals and dreams. And I want to say a big THANK YOU to each and every one of you too - for your continued support of the nurses of Canada!

Please stay tuned for more CNF news, including a monthly donor contest, CNF’s 2016 Nightingale Gala and Biennial Reception, and the launch of a new and exciting campaign! Stay happy and healthy, and don’t forget to visit our website! Invest in nurses! See the difference in health care!
